About

Andrei Roiter's artistic practice for decades has concerned itself with finding ways to create visual statements about universal human experiences. Roiter spotlights these rather elemental forms and insists that they deserve our best attention.

In recent years, Roiter has moved towards a more personal and intuitive approach to image-making. Instead of deploying photography, as he did for many years, the artist allows for a more intuitive process in drawing and painting. Without reference to pre-existing images, these recent works are located somewhere between the familiar and the obscure. They transcend obvious definitions of abstraction and representation. Roiter wishes to translate complex and intangible experiences—solitude, melancholy, memory, hope and fear—into basic, fundamental forms, bringing to mind the work of Giorgio Morandi, whose simple shapes vibrate softly to touch us at our depths.

Architecture has long been a jumping off point for Andrei Roiter to address human conditions. Still following the rules of perspective, recent paintings show geometric shapes in line with minimalist sculpture and elements of modernist design, sometimes pointing to Russian Constructivism and Bauhaus. Roiter's works abide in ambivalence; images often contain a lighted glow amidst darkness, danger or void, and it is uncertain which is winning. It seems as if these paintings are asking if there can be optimism within an all-enveloping shroud of uncertainty and doubt.

Andrei Roiter was born in Moscow in 1960. He attended the Moscow Institute of Architecture from 1978-1980, during which time he began to show his works in underground exhibition spaces. Since the mid-80's Roiter took part in several international exhibitions of Russian art in Europe and the U.S. Since 1990, Roiter settled down in Europe, exhibiting in Germany, Switzerland, Sweden, Japan and the USA. Among the more notable exhibitions were those at Kunsthalle Basel, Switzerland; SF Museum of Modern Art, USA; Ludwig Forum, Aachen; Kunsthalle Recklinghausen, Germany; Schiedam State Museum, Netherlands; Kunstmuseum Solothurn, Switzerland; Moscow Museum of Modern Art, Moscow; Schunck Museum, Heerlen; Van Abbemuseum, Eindhoven, Netherlands; Centre Pompidou, Paris and in Bonnefantenmuseum Maastricht and Museum Helmond in the Netherlands. His work is in many private and public collections throughout the globe, mostly in the USA, Belgium and the Netherlands.

Always Somewhere Else

About Andrei Roiter and the emigration from the heart

By Wilma Sütö

He is the traveller who sends us on our way: Andrei Roiter, born in Moscow in 1960 and oscillating between Amsterdam and New York since 1990, often with detours via Russia to visit family. Bon Voyage is the name of his exhibition in Stedelijk Museum Schiedam, where drawings, paintings, photos and sculptures from previous years have been brought together in an installation that occupies the entire space. The title is a slogan referring to the work, but at the same time it is an encouragement and greeting to the visitor who comes to that work from the opposite direction. The artist and his public cross one another en route: the provisional terminus for the one is the point of departure for the other; the art is both a meeting place and an intermediate station.

Bon Voyage: articulate the words out loud and the world opens up. Landscapes change into vistas, sounds from foreign languages blow in through an open window. Joyful, to start with, since that is just the way French is; it sounds like a promise. Good Journey: it contains a plea for free imagination, a flight from closedness, an escape from rigidity. In other words: away from repression.

As Roiter elucidates:

“It was never my plan to travel as much, let alone emigrate. Neither my grandparents nor my parents had any mentionable freedom of movement within the Soviet Union, and none of them was able to leave the country. It seemed self-evident that I would fall into the same pattern. It is still a miracle that it turned out differently.”

“My journey began when perestroika made it possible to accept invitations from abroad. I departed for a two-week journey, carrying only a small suitcase. In retrospect, that was the start of a tourist trip that got a little out of hand. It has now lasted twenty years. The fact that I can live in various worlds – in America, with my wife from New York, and in old Europe, thanks to my studio and house in Amsterdam – is a blessing I greatly value and use as a source of inspiration. If I had not been able to leave my fatherland I would never have had all those experiences that have put my life into perspective and broadened my train of thought, so that my work can transcend the all-too-personal nature of a straightforward biography.”

The same suitcase with which Roiter left Moscow occupies a central position in his studio during the preparations for his retrospective. With its simply tiled interior, this corner building has retained the décor of the grocer’s shop that it once was. Now it serves as a combination of depot and workplace. The stocks of sugar, coffee, ice-lollies and beer that were still stored there when Roiter took over the premises have been swapped for rows of paintings and stacks of books and art magazines. Several user objects are also conspicuous, deviating only slightly from the normal version, being a kind of intermediary between sculptures and props. A wooden surveillance camera, painted silver grey, which is clearly blind but is nevertheless misleading, faces the glass shopdoor. And the suitcase also hangs on the wall: a dark-red example of hard-pressed cardboard with leather handles and metal reinforcements on the corners. Time has left its mark, but the suitcase, empty and light, carries no secrets. You can look straight through it. Roiter has made a large round hole in it. A circle in a rectangle: it is a balanced abstract construction. But it is also a sign with a personal touch, which expresses openness.

Roiter's work can never be captured in purely formal terms, not even when it is clear that it owes tribute to Russian Constructivism, which ironed out capricious reality with its mathematical play of forms. And although enough references to Malevich emanate via black and red squares, Roiter's work is less disengaged. He does not produce abstract icons. The subtle meditative character of his sculptures and paintings are closely connected to everyday life. Even if the suitcase is empty and light, it remains an item scarred by time, charged with an awareness of gravity. Or, to be more concrete, an awareness of political and social complexity. Roiter plays a poetic game with his own track record. He carries his past with him, just like the suitcase that contains his spiritual world, but through which he could suddenly disappear with a single athletic leap, as in a circus act.

In addition to his Russian predecessors, he also quotes the American artist and architect Gordon Matta-Clark, who used empty buildings as material by purposefully removing fragments: Matta-Clark created monumental round holes in the walls, floors and façades, so that the entire premises became transparent and the interior of the building was exposed: 'to convert a place in a state of mind'. In the case of Roiter, the punctured suitcase returns more than once in his paintings, floating as in a vision. It is a tried and trusted, and thus self-reinforcing, symbol of physical and mental freedom of movement. Now the hole suggests a tunnel with a perspectival vista of distant horizons, and then again the shadowy interior of the suitcase evokes a hole or cave, a dusky place of refuge. It is not without reason that the title of these paintings, which form a narrative and orienting part of the work, as is common with Roiter, is Escape.

"There is an autobiographical element to my work" the artist acknowledges, "but it harmonizes with experiences that are shared by people worldwide. In my case, I am a product of the totalitarian regime in which I lived for thirty years, with indelible anxieties and feelings of enchainment that are ingrained in the people from generation to generation. Escape was only possible via a route of internal emigration.

An intelligent person in the Soviet Union was doomed to lead a double life: with a job that satisfied the eyes of the authorities, but which also aimed at screening off the intellectual and emotional life that occurred in underground networks, living rooms or even in the forest if necessary, if we suspected that walls had ears. It is not a lifestyle that I would encourage, but it was certainly an exercise in autonomy. The production of art had a powerful function in this context: that of sublimated self-therapy."

Roiter quotes the French-American artist Louise Bourgeois: "Art is a guarantee of sanity". The therapeutic function of art apparently crosses borders as well – a discovery that can offer comfort to an artist adrift. This personal motto – "the most important thing I have said", according to Bourgeois herself – hangs above Roiter's working table, in black letters on pink paper reproduced upon a glossy picture postcard, in the elegant but scratchy handwriting of the grand old lady who died this year at the age of ninety eight.

Since Roiter assumed the role of traveller he has occupied this position, incorporating the whole gamut of prototypes: he is the willing exile, but also the marked stranger, he is the modern nomad and, also in the art world, not only a fellow player but also the eternal tourist who eagerly absorbs impressions. Restless is shown in large letters on one of his paintings that offers a view of an advertising text, in a mixture of Hollywood glamour and Soviet propaganda.

Roiter's work has a dreamy and playful side to it, but it is impossible not to notice the melancholy, dormant in the sunken colours and the patina of time. "Some people think that I lead the life of a celebrity" he says. "Whereas others abhor even the idea of such continuous dynamics. I love airports and aeroplanes, but you do get jetlag from that travelling." Being at home everywhere and nowhere does have its negative points, is what Roiter means, and he has summarized that side of the story in a seemingly simple sculpture. He furnished a brick with a handle, as if it were a small suitcase. The brick came from a dug-up street round the corner from his house in Amsterdam. It is rudimentary building material: perhaps the start of a new road on which to travel, perhaps the first stone of a house that could be erected always somewhere else. “Only in my poems can I make home / I have found refuge in no other form / I have not pined to call one place my own / A tent could not stand ground against a storm” wrote Slauerhoff in his poem Woningloze (No Home). Roiter’s work, which is romantic and conceptual in equal degrees, is the visual equivalent of that thought.

“My experiences, certainly as soon as I apply them as an artist, touch upon those formed by others”, he thinks. “Merely due to the fact that we are all on an ongoing journey through our lives. As a tourist you enjoy more privileges than the unwilling stranger, but notions of expectancy, of miscommunication and loneliness are universal. Every migrant personifies displacement. In a different country with a different language, there lurks double wealth, but also double isolation.” Just as Roiter speaks American with a Russian accent, his mother tongue has reciprocally been enriched with a Western accent, so that he is occasionally even regarded as a tourist in his native country. The traveller remains an outsider, it is inevitable. But, similar to Slauerhoff, the poet who sailed the seas as a ship’s doctor, Roiter is a traveller in a dual sense. He weaves himself into the myth, painting sayings such as ‘Please don’t help me to be you’ and portrays his alter ego deliberating on a globe: The Architect. The world is his domain.

In his work, Roiter, who studied at the Architecture Institute in Moscow, erects the décor of his own life as a passer-by and lends it the power of metaphor. He has made countless little buildings: scale models of waiting rooms, watchtowers, restrooms, shelters and study rooms. These are fragile structures, manually built from waste materials that may have been found on the streets or may come from his studio or library. They fit together just as irregularly as a provisorily constructed tree hut.

Planks and pieces of cardboard may be supported by books, or by photos and jotters. In this way, small nestboxes for dreams of the future and (youth) memories arise on meagre foundations such as a music stand. It is architecture blessed with a character and a soul, and therefore it is also the place of refuge for those driven to internal emigration – the emigration of the heart.

Although Roiter takes his public on a journey across continents, his work is above all a vehicle for the imagination. Take an image such as Hand Luggage (2010) literally instead of figuratively and it produces a wondrous performance: there goes a passer-by with a brick as hand luggage. Roiter: “Probably the person who does this is a little bit mad, to consider a brick valuable enough to carry around with him. On the other hand, perhaps this everyday variant of the philosopher’s stone is a symbol of knowledge to him.” Just like the punctured suitcase, the stone forms a prop in the visual story full of tragicomic twists and turns that the artist unfolds in his work.

Any visitor of his studio who has also seen the toilet library – stacks of art magazines – will discover on exiting that the toilet door is painted as a book cover, with a reinforced spine and corners and with the name of the artist as the title. You easily step through that door: welcome into the book that is called Roiter.
